

Say Hello to your very own book of Quotes

QuotationsBook

Quotes by Cockburn, Alexander

from QuotationsBook.com

Next week Reagan will probably announce that American scientists have discovered that the entire U.S. agricultural surplus can be compacted into a giant tomato one thousand miles across, which will be suspended above the Kremlin from a cluster of U.S. satellites flying in geosynchronous orbit. At the first sign of trouble the satellites will drop the tomato on the Kremlin, drowning the fractious Muscovites in ketchup.

- Cockburn, Alexander

A childish soul not inoculated with compulsory prayer is a soul open to any religious infection.

- Cockburn, Alexander

The travel writer seeks the world we have lost --the lost valleys of the imagination.

- Cockburn, Alexander

A just war is hospitable to every self-deception on the part of those waging it, none more than the certainty of virtue, under whose shelter every abomination can be committed with a clear conscience.

- Cockburn, Alexander

There is never finality in the display terminal's screen, but an irresponsible whimsicality, as words, sentences, and paragraphs are negated at the touch of a key. The significance of the past, as expressed in the manuscript by a deleted word or an inserted correction, is annulled in idle gusts of electronic massacre.

- Cockburn, Alexander

QuotationsBook